EXCELSIOR LINEN-MARKER and

Twas the bright, goldes birth of a fair summer's day When she dark clouds of might had wentered away. And the glow of the sunshine fell sofily and played On hillside and valley, on thicket and glade. The gentle wind stirred with its amorous breath. The wild flowers that dotted the enmy brown heath, And kiesed as it reseed, in its frollosome give.
The dow-drops that sparkled on leaflet and lea. There was beauty and love in the reay-huell sky, And the atreams rippled past with a soft inlinby; Mendow and upland looked blooming and fair, And Summer's bright roses aweet-scented the air.

The little birds caroled their diffies above, They sang to their mates a sweet tyric of love; As I Hetened with joy to the musical strain, There came to my memory happy visions again. There came tack a more—oh I long years ago— I scarcely can number them, time passes so; Then my hair was unfrosted by the winter of years, And my brow was unwrinkled by sorrows and cares

There came back a morn by the allvery Lee, When we wandered together, my Norsh and me; I told her my love as we walked by its tide, And yowed in the future to make her my bride. But, alas: all the joys of that dear time are fled.
All the hopes of my young heart lie withered and dead;
The green leaves of Summer have long ceased to grow,

The Spider and the Wasp.

The spider was a black, ugly fellow.

Not a large spider, but he bad a great many legs. He was brave and honest Edsar Hall enough in his way. His way was to catch and eat all the flies he could, and he had just spun a strong, new web for that purpose on the outside of the window, and made no secret of his intentions. Like others of his kind he had met with reverses. Many a good web had been blown down or swept away as soon as it was finished; but spiders must not allow themselves to be discouraged, so now he had made another. The wasy was three times larger than the spider, and a handsome fellow, neatly finished off in rings of black and yellow. He had a slender waist, but he looked like a villian, and had an unpleasant way of turning his head from side to side, and of rubbing first one ear and then the other, if they are ears, and of gnashing those nippers—if that is what he calls themon the side of his head.

No doubt the spider was the better of the two.

The wasp could sting very fiercely,

The could first place north of Grot by 100 safe valer (and structure) and structure, the he had just spun a strong, new web for that purpose on the outside of the win-

The wasp could sting very fiercely, and would at any time it had a mind to. On this particular day the spider had, perhaps, eaten a light breakfast—a small moth or the like—and was hungry, as one might imagine he would be, and had just stationed himself in his den to wait for his dinner. What the wasp wanted there it was difficult to tell. Perhaps he did not believe in spiders' webs, or was not afraid of them, but he came tumbling and blundering along, and the next minute be was caught in the web by one leg. The spider rushed out and wound a thread around the leg, but the wasp struggled so hard and shook the web so violently that the spider was obliged to go aloft and look to his fastenings. He seemed to do this cooly and deliberater, as though he had nothing else to think of. When he was satisfied, he returned to the combat as if sure to win.

Meanwhile the wasp continued to struggle and gnash his nippers, evidently in a rage that he should have been so stupid or so unlucky. The spider prudently kept out of the reach of the angry nippers, and watched his opportu-nity to wind a fresh thread around a leg whenever it was possible to do so safe-But the wasp, also, had many legs, and as soon as one was made fast another seemed to kick itself loose, and the fastenings of the web had to be attended to every other moment, so that the spider had his hands full, and it was difficult to imagine how it would end. One of the spectators was on the spider's side. She said she was afraid of wasps, and hoped this one would not get away, and she admired the coolness and skill of the spider. Another said her sympathies were entirely with the wasp, sympathies were entirely with the wasp, and it made her blood run cold to see the spider's deliberate proceedings. But all agreed not to interfere on either side.

The spider had another difficulty to contend with. While these active legs are being fastened at one moment and freeing themselves at another, the wasps four wings were whirling like the wings of a wind-mill—so fast that all that could be seen was a sort of cloud or mist where the wings should be. After failing many times the spider presently succeeded, in lashing two of these wings together, and gradually winding them tight, until they looked more like a together, and gradually winding them tight, until they looked more like a tight, until they looked more like a small dry twig than a pair of wings.—
Then he took a secure position upon these disabled wings, and from the secure the secure the secure that the secure th could not move. This appeared to dishearten the wasp, as well it might. His efforts grew feebler and feebler, till finally, the spider cautiously approached him and seemed to whisper in his ear, or he may have stung him, but the wasp became instanly motionless. His struggles were over. Now it was too late, the spider's admirer releuted, and said she was sorry for the wasp, and wished she was sorty for the wasp, and wished she had helped him.

Then the spider fastened on one side of the wasp's head, and stayed there till the spectators were tired of watching him. When they looked at him again, some time after, he had changed his position to the other side of the head. The wasp looked shriveled and dry, more like a mummy than the stout, burly fellow that he bad been.
